PITCH US A STORY!

In the RadioActive workshop, you'll learn how to tell TRUE stories using sound. So pitch us a story! That means: propose a story from your life or community that you want to tell, and that other people will want to hear.

What touches your heart, inspires you, confuses you, or makes you mad? What do people need to hear about? Who is someone you want to learn more about? The best stories are ones that mean something to you. Try to think of a story about someone that you could talk to in person.

STORY PITCH EXAMPLE

(From a past workshop application)

My story will be about my mom. What my mom is doing is trying to reteach me and my siblings how to speak and write Somali properly.

My mom is always calling us Somalia's lost generation. She says we came to America too young to have a culture and mother tongue to hold onto and that we need to learn now so that we can pass our culture and language on to our children. I think my story will hold listeners attention because people can relate to losing not only their mother tongue or culture but even family traditions that your parents may have made. We all have things we used to do with our families when we were young that we may have stopped doing, not because we forgot but because we just didn't want to take the time to do it.

I'd interview my mom, students at my high school who also forgot their home languages. The sounds I'd record would be my mother saying a word and me and my siblings repeating it to learn, me and my friends/siblings speaking in broken Somali, my mom and aunts speaking fluently in Somali.

I hope to learn why so many first generation immigrants have a hard time holding on to their culture and ways for us to connect to our cultures and languages without losing what we've learned of American culture and the English language. I want to tell this story because I think people feel ashamed of not being able to speak to their parents or grandparents, and not being able to connect to them the way they could if language/cultural norms weren't different. It's important to talk about the problems in day to day life for immigrants to help ease the process of their moving and to show that there are people like them in the media.
